WASHINGTON, July 24.—Every seat in the gallery was filled again today when the Senate met. Resumption of the navy firing against the Executive was anticipated. The strain and excitement were almost as great as when the firing commenced yesterday.

The Senators themselves were slow in arriving, most of them remaining in the cloak-rooms until the morning business was completed.

Senator Vilas, of Wisconsin, who was expected to defend the President against some of the aspersions cast upon him yesterday was, however, on and early, as was also Senator Hill, of New York, who was also billed for a speech.

At 12:25 Mr. Harris, the floor manager of the Tariff bill, called up the conference report, almost every seat on the floor was occupied.

to a speech. He agreed, he said, at the outset with Mr. Gorman, that the Democratic party was in the midst of a great crisis. The Democratic party was in a position to take the lead in the country, but it had been entrusted with power. It had gone to work to reclaim the pledges it had made. The greatest of those was that to reform the tariff. The House had passed a Tariff bill which, aside from its income tax, was a bill which would give general satisfaction and approval. As it passed this Senate, however, after long weary months of debate, it was not satisfactory, and it violated the pledges of the party. It went to conference.

Mr. Hays then turned and confronted the Senator with the fact that the Senate had made the bill inconsistent, had made it unworthy of Democratic support. They rejected the duty on coal and iron. They refused to yield and there was no hope estimate, all people were in an uproar. His (Hill's) motion that the Senate recede from the coal and iron duties was in the line of an agreement.

House Backed by People.

It would do no good to obstinately refuse to the position taken when the people will not support any sign of yielding on the part of the House?"

When asked, addressing his Democratic colleagues, "Backed by the public press of the country, by the Democratic masses and the President of the United States, as it undoubtedly is, should we yield on these points? Why not yield on these points and see whether it does not lead to an agreement?"

He was not, he said, talking about Mr. Vilas's motion to recede from the differential in favor of the Sugar Trust. Mr. Vilas could not understand and those who made the bill was to become a law.

He said he was in sympathy with

The President violated no clause of the Constitution when he sent that letter. He had the right to do it. It was a private communication. The question was not whether it was sent by a messenger of his sender and receiver. It was one with which Senators had nothing to do. No Democrat on the floor could controvert the position take by Mr. Cleveland in that letter. He saw that to place a doubt on our President's letter was to place a doubt on the authority of the party, and would place the party, whose success he desired, in a false and indefensible position.

Democrats with Cleveland.

The Democrats of the country were in sympathy with Mr. Cleveland. Democrats at the Democratic convention met all over the country had indorsed the Wilson bill in respect to free raw materials. On the other hand, the Senate bill had been received everywhere with member of the Finance Committee also announced himself as personally in favor of free coal and free iron. The Senator from Maryland (Mr. Gorman), on the other hand, with the "frankness and boldness" which was his nature, had boldly thrown aside the mask on yesterday and had proclaimed himself in favor of a tariff on coal and iron.

"A revenue tariff," suggested Mr. Gorman quietly.

"A revenue tariff as you will," replied Mr. Hill, "but nevertheless a tariff."
